Fitness Camp Helps Build Muscle, Confidence

WHAT about us?" was the cry from the teenage boys at Shriners Hospital for Children-Chicago. After all, there was GLAHM Camp a week filled with makeovers, health and wellness education and nights on the town for young women at the Chicago Shriners Hospital with spinal cord injuries. GLAHM stands for "Good Life and Healthy Mind."

When was the guys' turn?

Sara J. Klaas, director of the spinal cord injury service in Chicago, decided to create a program just for them.

"I was inspired by GLAHM Camp," said Klaas. "I thought the guys would love to learn about wheelchair body building, so I decided to get a hold of Nick."

"Nick" is Nick Scott, a former patient of Sara's who has become a championship winning trailblazer of wheelchair fitness and body building. He leaped at the chance to lead the camp and introduce the young men at the Chicago hospital to new fitness opportunities.

"Body building creates confidence," said Scott. "It shows them what they can accomplish and really opens up a new reality for them."

The body building camp featured five days of learning and fun. The guys discovered more about nutrition, fitness options, healthy supplements and how to get in a good cardio workout — a challenge when you can only use your arms.

"They even got to play laser tag, which helps maintain agility," shared Klaas. "It was a great week."

For the grand finale of the week, Scott worked with some of the participants on competitive posing. While that was definitely fun, Scott hopes the guys left the camp with some solid information.

"I hope they gained some skills for living healthier lives," he said. "I hope they choose to make good nutrition and staying active a part of their general lifestyles."

If the response gathered from post-camp surveys is any indication, Scott need not worry about the impact of the camp.

"This camp changed my life," said one young man. "I realize no one needs to be left out," shared another.

"We just wanted to help these kids realize what they could access and open some doors for them," Klaas explained. "Hopefully we can turn this into an annual program and spread the idea to other Shriners Hospitals for Children across the country."
